Data Privacy Laws in Asia: 2013 Update

A comprehensive survey of privacy and data protection in the region

Tuesday 23 July 2013 | 8.45am – 5.15pm | UNSW Kensington Campus, The Law Building

Objective

44 countries outside Europe now have data privacy laws, twelve of them in Asia – and we can add significant new Internet Regulations in China and Indonesia. Other Asian countries are developing privacy Bills, and in 2012 three countries brought in new laws and four others strengthened existing laws. Data privacy legislation is 'here to stay' in Asia, but the form it takes differs dramatically between countries.

You will be taken on a comprehensive exploration of the Asian jurisdictions with data privacy laws by Graham Greenleaf.

The focus of much of the world's commercial activity is shifting toward Asia, and data privacy compliance must now be part of any planning for this. Any business or agency representative, or their advisors, involved in activities or commerce in this dynamic region will be better equipped, after attending this workshop, to consider the risks and obligations of collecting, using or transferring personal data in, to or from these jurisdictions. Obligations of privacy compliance can arise in many ways. The seminar will provide you with a framework for comparison and understanding the nature of national legislative regimes, and their enforcement powers and will alert you to new developments on the horizon.

This workshop will also provide you with narrative materials and considerable reference material (over 100 pages of commentary) to assist you to begin planning your privacy compliance or risk management plans for the Asian region.

This workshop will provide participants with the benefit of the distilled knowledge of one of the world's leading researchers and advisors on Asian privacy laws, who will identify the key aspects of data protection and privacy regulation in Asia. This workshop is essential knowledge for any corporation or legal advisor with global commercial activities or ambitions.
